Youth on Trial calls attention to the absence of evidence supporting that assumption. For, as a century of developmental psychology has shown, adolescents are not like adults. Their abilities to reason and understand, their emotional maturity, and the way that they make decisions are all different. But, as the authors of Youth on Trial point out, recent changes

Importance: Despite the high prevalence, evidence-based treatments for abuse-related posttraumatic stress disorder (PTSD) in adolescents have rarely been studied. Objective: To examine whether developmentally adapted cognitive processing therapy (D-CPT) is more effective than a wait-list condition with treatment advice (WL/TA) among adolescents with PTSD related to childhood abuse.
